Zac Bowden, Windows Central: In 2024, Microsoft and Qualcomm kicked off a new category of Windows hardware it called 'Copilot+ PCs' that set the baseline for a new wave of AI-first computers, and launched with exclusive features that would not be made available on PCs that didn't meet a new set of system requirements. The launch didn't go smoothly. [...] I've noticed that none of the Surface PCs launched in 2026 include the Copilot+ PC moniker in their product names, unlike the Surface PCs that launched in 2025 and before. Now, you have to go digging to find any mention of Copilot+ compatibility in specification sheets. Microsoft's had to dig a lot of holes in the ground behind that shed over the years. The lesson here is that good devices are just good devices. A good PC is going to be a good PC for AI too. Wasting time with special branding is a distraction from the core task of just making the devices good. ?

An earlier post presented an elegant plane geometry theorem discovered by the 19th century school teacher Auguste Miquel. This post presents his pentagon theorem. Start with a pentagon. It may be irregular, but it needs to be convex. Extend each of the sides of the pentagon to form a star, then draw five circles, one [...] The post Miquel's pentagon theorem first appeared on John D. The previous post discussed a superficial connection between modal logic and topology, that both use the terms regular and normal to indicate added sets of axioms. McKinsey and Tarski developed a deeper connection between modal logic and topology that we'll discuss here. Starting with a topological space X and a proposition p , define $[[p]]$ as the set [...] The post Topological models of modal logic first appeared on John D. Cook .

You can't say much about modal logic in general. You have to be more specific to get anywhere. You have to choose some axioms. Ideally the axioms you need for your application correspond to a named set of axioms that has been studied before. The situation is similar in point-set topology. You can't say very [?] The post Modal logic and topology first appeared on John D. Cook .

8. My Pitch for the New Season of Doctor Who

With the news that the BBC are tendering for a new series of Doctor Who, I thought I'd write down what I want from the show. This is, to be fair, pure fan-service wankery with zero chance of being made. I've based it on the oft-made observation that Hollywood is obsessed with remaking successful films rather than trying to remake unsuccessful ones. Do we really need another Spider-Man origin?

9. ?I'm Embarrassed on Behalf of the Tech Industry?

That's something Ben Thompson said a recent episode of Dithering . He was referring to how he felt while trying to help his mom get control of her digital life. Everything was just too hard and convoluted and he felt embarrassed as someone who works in tech. That very same evening, I randomly got this text from a family member. I hear this a lot from family and friends who sit outside tech. ?Nothing works.? ?Everything is hard to use.? ?I can't make sense of this.? And to them I am a representative, a connection, to this pain in their lives. And I, too, am embarrassed on behalf of the tech industry ? by our collective failure.
